RIPENING OF WINE.

How the Juice of the Grape is Treated

The wine in Switzerland is left in the casks till the following spring, and it is here that fermentation takes place, and the must is converted into wine, says the Cornhill Magazine. The change begins almost immediately; the liquid becomes turbid, carbonic acid gas is evolved, a scum is thrown up on the surface and the temperature rises. A climax is reached; the intensity of the fermentation diminishes, subsides, the scum settles as a slimy deposit at the bottom of the cask and a clear yellow liquid is left above. The grape sugar has almost entirely disappeared, a corresponding amount of alcohol has taken its place, and the sweet taste of the must has given place to the characteristic vinous flavor of the wine.

In the early stages of fermentation enormous quantities of carbonic acid gas are given off, and huge fires are made in the cellars to drive it away.
But at the time I write of (October, 1893), when the vintage was the finest of the century, when barrels to hold must could not be purchased for love or money, when every cellar was packed with casks of must, so great was the amount of carbonic acid gas in the air that, in spite of every precaution, several deaths from suffocation took place among the workers. In the spring the wine is drawn off clear into other barrels, then bottled; in ordinary cases is not bottled at all, but simply drawn from the wood. This is the wine sold at all the little wineshops with which Switzerland abounds. It is drawn off into quaint little glass decanters containing half a liter each, and is served to the guests in the restaurant, several deaths from suffocation

sold at all the little wineshops with
